Approach to the patient with chronic neck pain. Chronic pain is a significant problem of all societies and one that we must all be prepared to handle. The physician treating the chronic pain patient must possess a thorough understanding of the anatomy and physiology of the neck and upper extremities. After this foundation is established, then the diagnostic workup must proceed appropriately and proceed in a systematic fashion as the differential is narrowed. Neck pain is frequently a multifactorial problem. The treating physician must take a step-by-step approach in assessing and formulating the appropriate treatment plan and then monitoring the patient carefully. Specific aspects of this plan include aggressive mechanical examination of the neck, dental and head and neck pathology, and adverse psychologic factors.

Treatment goals include relief of the pain and no loss of function./**

Art: In Metamorphoses

(1915), Ovid-in-translation, renowned poet and early advocate of the collective consciousness, expresses deep concern for the way the rapidly changing world is changing humanity:

“what was once human can no longer be said to be human, because the unalterable is changing things day after day” (Leintz, pp. 641-642). The passage, highlighted for me by a comment made on a class composition in Econ 60/181 by the professor, drew me to consider my own ideas about the collective consciousness (discussion paper forthcoming). Ovid’s imagining of these changes is well expressed. His sense of ‘loss’, given voice in the third person ‘A has fallen’, is later represented by the 'falling away' of Herodotus from humanness, as recounted by Macrobius (c. 400) (Leintz, p. 642). Given that the characterisation of these changes is made in a tragedy, and that similar concerns are explicit in works by numerous other literary figures in the Greek and Roman tradition, this concerns some of my topic areas (history and the modern imagination). As the modern imagination is to some extent a product of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, I took the 'falling away' as representing the loss of the deep narratives of the past, and the over-riding sense of 'now' that characterises late modernity. Herodotus' telling of the fall of the Greeks from the divinely ordered world into the new barbarity is appropriately mourned in the tragedies, but perhaps also a harbinger of the loss of the urban, mainly Jewish life as perceived by the author of Luke 4:16-29. The passage from Ovid has resonated with me partly because, in terms of the categories that preoccupy my students, its 'death of the author' runs counter to the narrative of a rational-objective author, however post-modern and emergent, who normally exists beyond the text (the stories I tell my students tend to be the ones that end, whilst the characters can't interact with each other). The vision of civilisation-as-process in the third person narrators of late-modernity (fallen from the divinely ordered world into barbarism) fits well with the way that it
